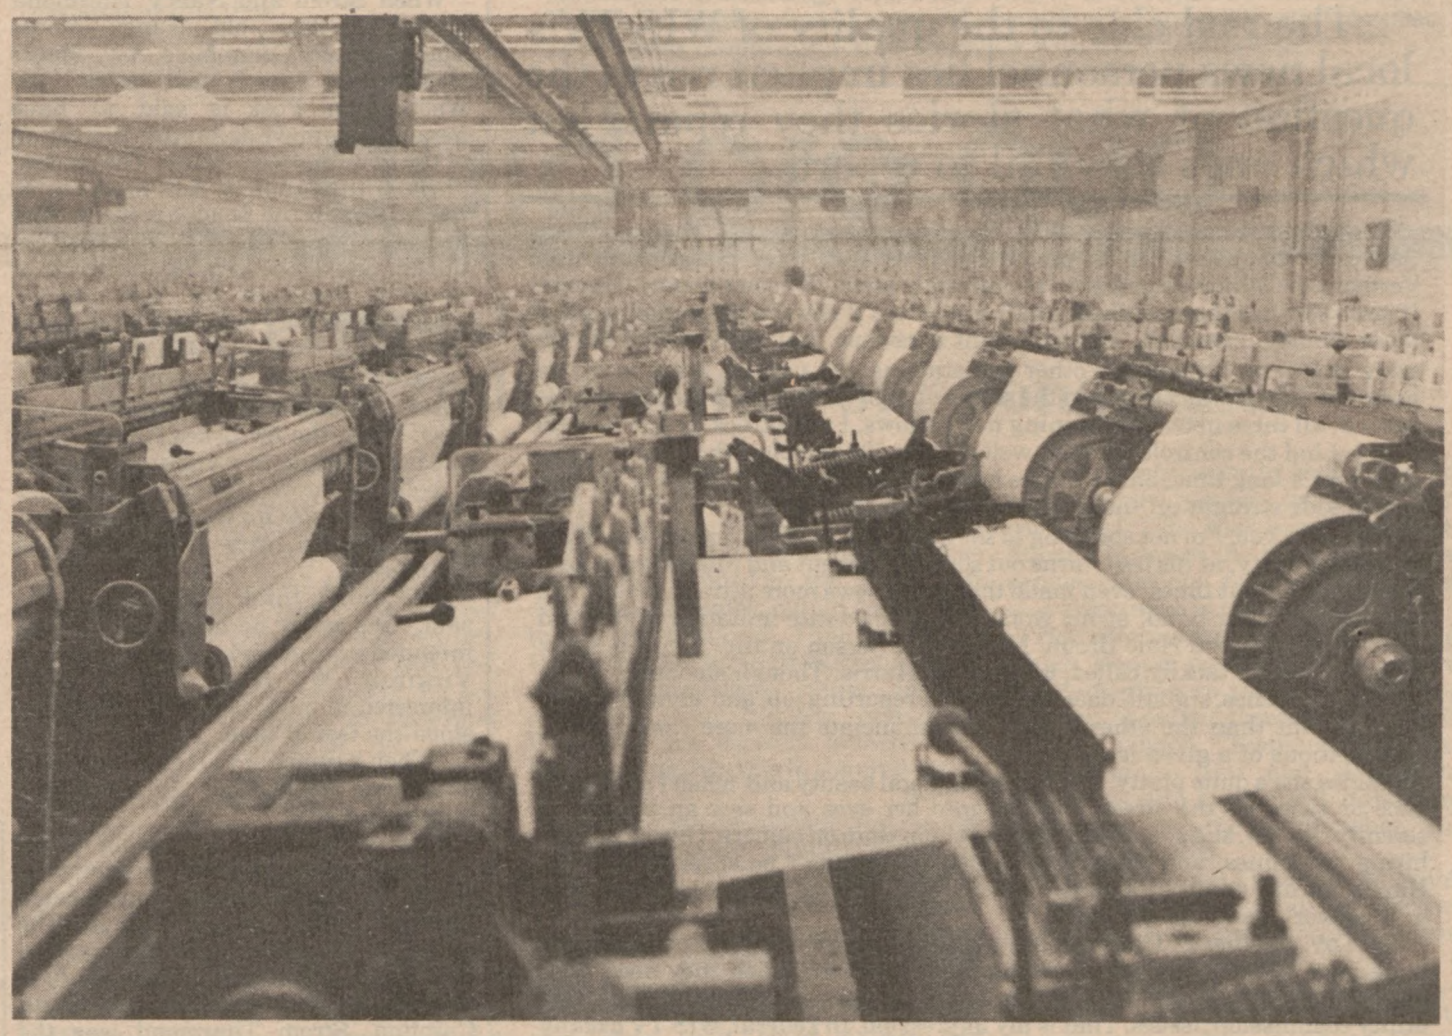
Shuckin' and jivin' for J.P. Stevens

Several weeks ago, a press release from Benedict College announced president Henry Ponder would lead a group of prominent citizens on a two-day tour of the state's textile industry, in an effort to counteract the "unobjective criticism" of the industry by union sympathizers.

The giant J.P. Stevens Co., headquartered in South Carolina, has of course been the most frequent object of criticism lately—the company is under fire by textile unions, the federal government and human rights organizations as a result of its longstanding battle to maintain its cheap labor pool by fighting unionization. Stevens' modern plant on Lake Hartwell near Clemson was the first stop on the tour. Osceola senior editor Elton Manzione, who has reported on Stevens and the unionization controversy for several years, went along on the first day of the tour. This is his report.



Cotton dust hangs in the air of the weave room at J.P. Stevens' Clemson plant.

by Elton Manzione

"This country has been built on the free enterprise system and what we've seen today is a good example of how it works. It's not a perfect system but it's the best system on this planet. This plant and others like it are constantly working to improve conditions," Dr. Henry Ponder, black educator and president of Benedict College, said to the group of about 40 people.

"People benefit from this operation and the industry. This tour is a symbol of J.P. Stevens' agressive involvement in the community," former black activist and newspaper publisher Redfern II chimed in.

The two were addressing a group of community leaders who had just returned from a two-hour tour of J.P. Stevens' Clemson plant. Their remarks gave credence to the suspicion that the "textile information tour," organized by Ponder, was going to turn into a put-up public relations job for the textile industry.

The suspicions arose early when Ponder said he wanted to take a group of community leaders on a tour of the textile industry to study the "unobjective criticisms aimed at the textile industry by various groups."

According to Ponder, the South Carolina Textile Manufacturers' Association accepted the idea "gladly" even offering to pay the $3,000 tab for the tour. The SCTMA provided transportation, lodging, meals and even a drink or two for the participants. The $3,000 price tag was cheap for an industry whose average pension after 25 years of service amounts to $100 a month. It was a golden opportunity to sell their story and they weren't about to blow it.

The selection of plants to be visited was obviously carefully made. The giant J.P. Stevens' Clemson plant is generally considered the jewel of the Stevens chain. The Deering-Milliken Research Center, another stop on the tour is also considered a showplace in its own right.

"They've been real selective in plants that they've opened for tours," Harold McIver, director of the Industrial Union Division of the AFL-CIO said.

"It's right on the lake (Lake Hartwell). The area is real pretty and it's a much newer facility than most and a generally cleaner operation," McIver said of the Stevens Clemson Plant.

The Milliken Research Center, McIver said, was a similar set-up.

"That's a real pretty place too. They've got the big fountains and a nice lawn. It's real impressive, but it's hardly typical."

The tour of the plant itself was also carefully orchestrated. Two hours before Ponder made his remarks, the group had been broken up into smaller groups of four with a member of the press accompanying each group. It was my second trip through the Clemson plant.

Covering 30 acres and employing 2,000 people, the giant plant is impressive at first sight. Indeed the whole process of textile manufacturing is impressive at first sight. It was this first impression the textile executives

Some Good things

Your humble correspondent admits to being often critical, perverse, skeptical, iconoclastic and downright nasty. That's not so terrible. A study of brain waves by Harvard psychologist Colin Martindale tends to show that most creative people have such predilections, while the less creative (though not necessarily less intelligent) describe themselves as conventional, content, virtuous and rational. Well, this week's column is going to be all Sweetness and Light for a change. After having lived in Columbia for near to two years now, I've culled from memory and experience a precious few things worthy of praise, more or less.

Responsive Government: Not too long ago I wrote a column item describing a tawdry scene where sundry lowlife types spread their litter and filth along Old Percival Road of a hot Saturday afternoon. It so happened that a few days after the column came into circulation, a new sign appeared at the site I had described in the column. The local Dentsville government had posted a warning, writ in large letters, against dumping. Since it was the only sign of its category on Old Percival Road, and since it was nailed to its tree shortly after the column, I have fair reason to think there was a cause-and-effect relation. Of course if Dentsville officials were ever asked about it, they would vehemently deny having acted in response to such an inflammatory personage as myself, writing a column in so notorious a rag as Osceola.

But let's assume two and two makes four--that the posting of the anti-dumping sign across from my home was a response to my column. If so, then it was a touching act, minor though it was. At least the Dentsville government had endeavored to try and do something, in marked contrast to most local Southern governments. which customarily give local citizens the back of their hand. Needless to say, some Dentsville cretins defied the sign by throwing especially large quantities of litter at the foot of it, and eventually they tore it down, so greatly did it offend their barbaric instincts. Ah well, government can only do so much.

> "...The real clue to the quality of WIS-TV's local news personnel lies implicit not in the question of what stories they report, but which ones they fail to report..."

Technical Competence: WIS-TV news, whatever else it may be, is flawlessly competent in its production. I've seen local newscasters from Vermont to California and they're uniformly awful. By comparison, Channel 10 probably has the smoothest small-city local TV news in the nation; none of those clumsy, clownish, amateur-night screwups that daily punctuate the news shows on Columbia's other two stations. (At various times in my reportorial days, I was present in the studio and/or control room during live telecasts of all three networks' evening news shows. I was struck by one fact: the men behind the controls are men well in their 40s and 50s, who've been doing their jobs a long time, men who are businesslike pros; local stations use high school kids straight off the streets in their control rooms.)

Now mind you, I'm not speaking to the quality of WIS-TV's reporting. Then let me: Joe Petty, at his best, turns out some intelligent and interesting sports reports; he has, at times, even made the sports news more attractive than the rest. On the other hand, at his worst he's a third-rate imitation of Howard Cosell-cum-Heywood Hale Broun. My favorite person on the "TV Ten News Team" as it's so tackily called, is Chrystal Harris. Though she many times lapses into cliches, she still does a competent reporting job, and she seems a bit less hesitant than the other reporters to enunciate the more controversial ramifications of a given issue.

Besides she's quite pretty. Her face has a regal beauty and, when I espied her once or twice on the street, I looked into her eyes and saw an intelligent serenity. In fact, she's more striking in person than on camera. Given the FCC hiring guidelines, and given her abilities, I wouldn't be surprised if Miss Harris one day winds up a major network OAO (owned and operated) station, or a network news department.

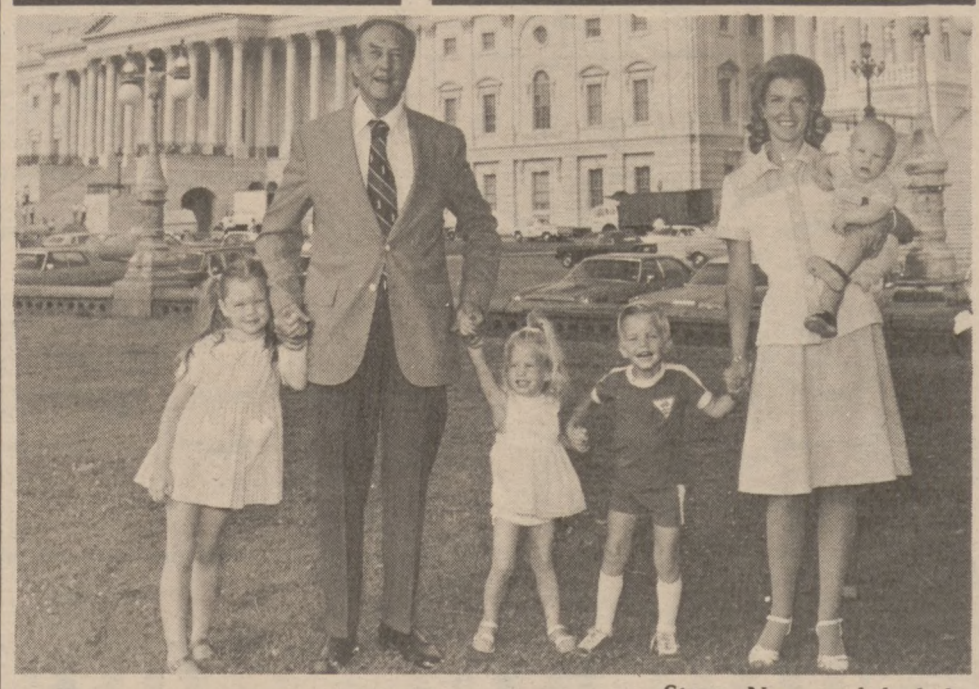
Joe Loy, another of Channel Ten's stable, has done some good reporting; sometimes he's not shy about asking hard questions when they need to be asked. But other times, Loy seems to be pushing pro-nuclear, anti-ERA, pro-utility commission, issues. That is my impression. In general, WIS-TV usually gives the short end of the stick, in its reports, to those who challenge the strict status quo (albeit this trend seems to have slightly abated with the apppearance of Lou Green, to replace anchorman Ed Carter; Carter many times sounded like a mouthpiece for the governor's office).

The real clue to the quality of WIS-TV's local news personnel lies implicit not in the question of what stories they report, but which ones they fail to report. Yet after all, TV news is, by tradition and almost by nature, shallow, quick, requiring drama, frightful of offending advertisers. A few years ago I interviewed Walter Cronkite on this matter, and he saw hour-long network news as a partial answer. Hour-long newscasts are now commonplace in sundry large cities.

Some good foods: Breyer's chocolate ice cream: Dannon yogurt; Gallo Rhine wine; Celeste pizzas; the Barbequed beef spare ribs at the Columbia Mall Piggly Wiggly.

So much for the compliments. And mind you, I'm not pals with any Dentsville officials and I have no connection with the foods listed above and I've never met any people from Channel Ten. That is to say, my remarks are untainted by bias.

Isn't it boring to be nice?



Strom, Nancy and the kids

Nancy Jr. goes to school

When Strom and Nancy Thurmond placed six-year old Nancy Moore Thurmond in Columbia's A.C. Moore elementary school last week, the Washington Post is said to have heralded the move as another indication of the new improved South. The student black/white ration at A.C. Moore is 50-50 and 44% of the faculty is black. And here was Strom Thurmond, ex-segregationist, one of the lingering symbols of the Old South in the U.S. Senate, escorting his very own little white child through the front door of a moderately-integrated facility. The yankees loved it.

Locally observers had a more cynical view. When the AP asked Nancy, Sr. if placing the child in a public school was a political move designed to garner more black votes for the Senator in next year's election, Mrs. Thurmond was nonplussed.

"We didn't think about that," she said. "It's really no big thing. We had intended to send her to a public school in Virginia. We have always been interested in public schools. They have stood the test of time.

"When it comes to your children,"Mrs. Thurmond concluded, "you try to keep politics out of it."

Four years ago an Osceola editor attended "consecration" ceremonies at the W. Wyman King Academy, located between Batesburg and Saluda. The school, as the editor's subsequent article noted, was at that time the newest of 115 segregated private academies in South Carolina. Strom Thurmond was the main speaker.

After recognizing two prime originators of the segregated independent school movement in the state as "true Americans," Thurmond launched into elaborate praise of the private school movement in South Carolina, a movement that began in earnest in the late 1960s in conjunction with court-ordered school desegregation. Independent schools, Thurmond told the audience, are an "indication of the vigor and adventure inherent in South Carolinians...Independent schools mean everyone can have a choice about the kind of education they want for their children."

The newly-constructed Wyman King Academy, Thurmond declared, "stands as a symbol to quality education." He expressed the hope that "the school grows and grows to encompass the two-county area with unselfish service."

During his speech Thurmond blasted the Internal Revenue Service which at the time was threatening to withdraw the tax-exempt statuses of private schools that refused to sign a statement declaring a non-discriminatory admissions policy.

Thurmond summed it all up by declaring that "the free enterprise system is what made Americans great--the strongest nation in the world today--and the private school movement in the state follows in that tradition. Private enterprise creates competition, and the competition created by this movement will make all our schools, public and private, better places to educate our children."

This all happened four years ago, of course, and we're not ones to go around dragging up old quotes and pasting them on the politicians who've been "born again." If you attempted to do that in this state, you'd have your life's work cut out for you. But we find Mrs. Thurmond's "we didn't think about that" a bit hard to swallow. Thurmond's admirers as well as his detractors know him as a consummate politician--he always "thinks about that."

Mrs. Thurmond says that "when it comes to your children, you try to keep politics out of it." We're reminded of a story someone told us recently about when the Thurmond children attended a local theatre production of Hansel and Gretel. Every member of the cast and every individual involved in the production received notes signed by the children saying how they enjoyed it.

The man is a politician's politician.

And if there's any question as to whether Mrs. Thurmond speaks for the Senator, we'll settle that here and now. As she told an Osceola reporter early last winter, "I think whatever Strom thinks."

More on ERI

Osceola has learned that a study proposal submitted to the U.S. Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA) by the South Carolina Energy Research Institute (ERI) was actually the product of another company's work, and had originally been done for the state. (Osceola, Aug. 12.)

The firm, Enwright Associates, learned of ERDA's interest in waste heat recovery through informal channels around the beginning of the year and informed the Governor of ERDA's interest in this type of energy program. Following a meeting with Enwright, the Governor, representatives of the State Development Board, and the Department of Health and Environmental Control, met with ERDA officials in Senator Strom Thurmond's office and, according to reports, ERDA officials were receptive to the idea of using low level waste heat from the Savannah River Plant, but the state had to come up with a funding proposal in order to get the money; money which both ERDA and the state were interested in getting.

According to sources close to ERDA, the agency at the time was trying to garner political support for a transfer of funds from a centrifuge uranium enrichment program into the heat conservation study.

"It was one of those deals where the nuclear people and the conservation people were scrambling for funds. They (the conservation group) needed to get some proposal in the works in order to justify the money. They killed two birds with one stone in this: they got Thurmond's support by giving the contract to the state, and they got out a proposal justifying the money," an ERDA source claimed. But the rush was on for both ERDA and the state.

"By this time it was getting near appropriation time and ERDA needed the proposal so I think they gave the South Carolina people a pretty tight time frame," the ERDA source said. meanwhile back in South Carolina the home folks were busy.

"The governor asked if we could have the proposal worked up within 30 days. I think ERDA needed it too for their budget requests to Congress, " Ken Tinsley of Enwright Associates said.

So Enwright Associates, the State Development Board, and, the Governor's energy task force began, feverishly working on the proposal under the direction of Scott Mcleod, ERI's acting director who was then with the State Development Board. It was this proposal which received the strong criticism from the academic community noted in an Osceola story on ERI two weeks ago.

"The first proposal was real slim and it wasn't too good, that I'll agree. It was mainly because of the time. It was done quickly to meet the deadline," a source within the Governor's office said. According to the source, ERDA officials rewrote the proposal to keep it going through the funding channels, a highly irregular practice.

"They didn't think it was all that good, but they felt the basic idea was o.k., so they shaped it up some, internally, to keep it going," the source said.

Tinsley and one ERDA official denied the proposal had been re written by ERDA. "Some discussions were held with ERDA staff to get ideas on what they wanted, but I wouldn't say it was rewritten," Tinsley said.

Marvin Gunn, in charge of ERDA's waste heat program, flatly denied ERDA rewrote the original proposal.

"We aren't allowed to do that. If it's not right we have to send it back. They have to rewrite it," Gunn said.

But another ERDA official, DR. John Belding who heads the conservation program, avoided answering the question entirely.

"We normally send it back to them if it's not up to par," Belding said in response to a question as to what ERDA did with proposals which were not up to their standards.

"What did you do in this case?" Belding was asked.

"I'm not real sure. I just don't know all the internal workings that went on," Belding replied.

Belding said an agreement was reached with the state on the proposal with the understanding that ERI would get the contract to do the study; even though at the time the Governor's executive order establishing the institute had not yet been issued, a staff had not been selected, and the entire organization had not yet been formulated.

According to one source within the Governor's office a great deal of criticism, both in and out of the governor's office, developed over the proposal at this time.

"There were a lot of people uncomfortable with both the proposal at this time. Word of this got back to ERDA and they put a hold on the procurement contract which had already been sent to (ERDA operations office at) the Savannah River Plant," the source said.

Belding denied a hold had been put on the procurement package, but his denial was countered by Tinsley, who said some type of hold was placed on the procurement after Enwright Associates stepped out of the picture.

According to Belding, a contract has been signed between Erda and ERI to conduct the Low Level Waste Heat study. Published reports, including one quotation of Gubernatorial Aide Walter Pettiss, had the contract running as $1.5 million. According to Belding however the contract is in the area of $500,000, of which ERI will receive $150,000.

Curiously enough, Thurmond, shortly after the intital letter of intent was drawn up, received a $500 campaign contribution from the United Technologies Company Political Action Fund. United Technologies is one of the prime subcontractors on the study and will probably get the biggest slice of the money pie after ERI.

One big question which comes to mind is why did Enwright Associates sit still while the rug was pulled out from under them?

"I just figured the long term potential of ERI was worth it. It was basically a business decision to let the contract go," Tinsley said.

But one statehouse insider had another assessment of the generosity.

"They do a lot of work for various state agencies and I think they just didn't want to alienate a lot of state officals," the source said.

So it seems as though everyone is happy: ERI has their contract, ERDA had their money, Enright has the potential for more state work, Strom has made a political ally of Governor Edwards, and United Technologies has their piece of the action. Everybody's happy, except for perhaps a few disgruntled taxpayers who don't like paying for the jubilation.

quid pro quo

Judge Frank Johnson: "You have to live with your conscience"

Alabama federal judge Frank Johnson was recently selected by President Carter to succeed present FBI Director Clarence Kelly when Kelly steps down January 1, 1978. Last week, Johnson underwent heart surgery but is expected to fully recover. Congressional confirmation hearings will be held this fall.

This article first appeared in the Los Angeles Times on August 18. Jack Bass is writer-in-residence at S.C. State College and coauthor of "The Orangeburg Massacre" and "The Transformation of Southern Politics."

By Jack Bass

In my mind, if there is one link between J. Edgar Hoover and Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., nominated Wednesday to follow in the footsteps of the venerable FBI chief, it is the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. Specifically, the link is their reaction as public officials to this one man—reactions that were almost diametrically opposite.

Hoover's antipathy toward Dr. King is well known. I recall a former Newsweek editor discussing at a seminar at Duke University how Hoover had brought to an editorial conference his tapes of a bugged telephone conversation that allegedly linked Dr. King sexually to a white woman. The editor explained that the magazine declined to print the transcript, but added that Dr. King and the civil-rights movement subsequently were played down. There is no reason to believe that Hoover's smut-peddling stopped with one magazine or that he did not achieve his desired results.

Dr. King's leap to prominence began after his leadership in the Montgomery bus boycott, which ended when Frank Johnson, as a 38-year-old federal judge in that city, joined in the ruling that declared segregated public transportation unconstitutional. That decision in 1956 extended the 1954 Supreme Court school-desegregation ruling into a nonschool area for the first time. Indirectly, the decision launched Dr. King's leadership role in the civil-rights movement.

In 1965, Johnson forbade Gov. George Wallace to interfere with the march led by Dr. King, by then the established leader of the civil-rights movement, from Selma to Montgomery—an event that led to passage of the landmark Voting-Rights Act.

Personally, I have had brief encounters with both Hoover and Johnson. They are very different kinds of men, just as their differing reactions to Dr. King indicate.

In 1970, Jack Nelson—now Washington bureau chief for the Los Angeles Times—and I wrote "The Orangeburg Massacre," a book that told the story of the tragedy in which three black students were slain by white highway patrolmen on the campus of South Carolina State College in 1968. The book revealed that three FBI agents were at the scene when the shooting occurred, but that they did not disclose their presence for more than a month to investigating attorneys for the civil-rights division of the Justice Department, the parent agency of the FBI.

Hoover subsequently sent me a 3½-page letter, signed by him, that concluded, "The book is so biased in its attempt to smear the FBI that it raises serious questions as to the competence and objectivity of the authors."

The information about the agents, which Hoover contended was untrue, had come from an interview by Nelson with an assistant director of the civil-rights division. Testimony by the agents at a trial and subsequent interviews with them corroborated that they were on the scene when the shooting occurred.

Four years later, I interviewed Frank Johnson during research for another book, "The Transformation of Southern Politics." Strong-willed and independent, Johnson answered questions forthrightly. He declined to answer only when asked about his views of Wallace, who excited crowds in his first successful race for governor of Alabama in 1962 by calling Johnson "a low-down, carpetbaggin', scalawaggin', integratin', tool-mixin', race-mixin' liar." The two had been classmates at the University of Alabama law school.

In Alabama, Judge Johnson's bold application of the law to correct longstanding practices of social injustices made more impact on the daily lives of Alabamians than the stewardship of Wallace in the governor's office. The judge issued orders that brought reforms to mental health, prisons, tax assessments, the Highway Patrol and other areas of public policy. After an order by him

"Jacques Brel": a sub-par performance at Hiers

by Rick Sebak

Jacques Brel is alive and well, and thank God he's not visiting Columbia this month. He would have to be embarrassed by the Hiers Dinner Theatre production of the "cabaret musical" based on his songs.

"Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well And Living In Paris" as presented last Friday evening in the cavernous cafeteria on Hampton Street was a tasteless and half-hearted attempt to present twenty-five Brel songs as an after-dinner amusement.

Brel, a Belgian/French composer and singer, writes intriguing songs that demand careful attention and a deep love from those who try to interpret them. None of the songs that make up this show are light-headed or easy. They are intimate musical statements designed to grab the listener's heart and soul.

Back in the mid-Sixties, Eric Blau and Mort Shuman decided to translate and assemble a group of Brel songs into a theatrical piece for presentation in New York at the tiny Village Gate Theatre. They decided on a "libretto-less musical" which would survive on the strength of the songs alone. There is no plot to this show; each of the songs must immediately establish a world of its own, and their ability to do so resulted in the extreme popularity and long life of the Off-Broadway production.

Unfortunately, this new local production (featuring some out-of-town talent) is fighting too large a battle against its location and Adrian Elder's direction has apparently not instilled any great energy into the five players who sang the songs. The audience Friday night was not enchanted or moved to any noticeable degree, and halfway through the second act, when applause became perfunctory, nodding sleepers and bored audience members gradually became more apparent at tables all around the stage.

The buffet dinner beforehand was mostly forgettable, nearly institutional, certainly not worth favorable comment of any sort. Even followed by two and a half hours of "entertainment," it wouldn't be worth ten dollars.

Adrian Elder does an unnecessary half-hour warm-up show before "Jacques Brel" begins. He invites the audience to sing along with him on "Oh What A Beautiful Morning" and then introduces some of the cast members who perform for a few moments in what-Elder-would-like-to-call a "Las Vegas" style. The purpose of this part of the evening is unclear.

The cast of "Jacques Brel"

The show itself is presented on a raised platform in the middle of the Hiers Cafeteria which has to be one of the most inappropriate places for theatrical presentations of any sort in Columbia. To overcome the limitations and excessive size of this room would require a spectacular cast of mesmerizing performers and certainly no glow from the buffet line area and no on-again-off-again light in the "backstage" area.

The performers assembled for this production aren't able to surmount the other obstacles in their paths either. These obstacles include ridiculously poor staging (from my seat I saw more of the singer's rear ends than their faces), inappropriate stage pieces (a suspended fishing net that looks left over from poorly decorated Halloween party, and a set of huge black boxes which are too large for some of the performers to step onto easily) and silly costumes by Searle Rowland (if these all-black outfits were supposed to timeless and serve all purposes, why was fringe attached to the hem of the men's trousers? and why do the women wear whorish fringed garters?).

Among the cast members, only Michael Quigley was consistently interesting, and his inventive mime antics offered some indication of the limitless staging possibilities which these songs offer. His sincere and simplistic rendition of "Fanette" in the second act was an unexpected high point.

Elder introduced Jim Carlson before the show as its "star," but Carlson never once convinced me that he truly loved any of the songs, and his false enthusiasm was a hallmark of the whole production. There seemed to be little, if any, concern for the show: certainly no actor worth his salt would agree to play this show in Adidas sneakers. If the desired shows were not avavailable yet, Carlson and Quigley should have found acceptable substitutes rather than use misfits like these.

Nancy Shane is obviously a capable songstress, but she is not well-served by this staging. I cringed every time she had to climb atop one of those boxes. Likwise, Alma Garick and Eirka Wheeler deserve better treatment. Alma sang the famous "If You Go Away" ("Ne me Quittes Pas") with conviction and heartfelt believability but was unfortunately lost amid other less impressive performances. Erika Wheeler's chance to shine during "Timid Frieda" was destroyed (as were many other dramatic moments) by the omnipresent microphones. Surely Elder must realize that a song sung while holding a piece of bread has a dramatic power which cannot be matched by one sung while holding a microphone. When the mikes were off or refused to work, there was no trouble hearing the performers, and why Elder felt they were necessary is not apparent.

Michael Fauss was the show's musical director, and he on piano along with Michael Daris on flute, Campbell Freeman on percussion, and Mitch Earl on bass managed to give some idea of the musical power of the score. Sadly, however, there was little, if any, French flavor apparent in their presentation of the songs. An occasional accordian would have been a wonderful reminder of the songs' Gallic origins.

Actually, the word "Paris" in the title was the only indication of the existence of French originals for all these songs. Carlson and Quigley wore berets as young men while singing the first part of "Middle Class," but any francophile knows that old men, not young men, wear berets. It was only too obvious that no one involved in this production knew much about France at all.

The daring lyrics of Brel were originally translated faithfully by Blau and Shuman, but someone (Elder? Mr. Hiers?) decided that Columbia could not stomach frankness and mild obscenities,performers coyly avoid saying "ass" during "Middle Class," a song in which the expletive would have important power. Similarly, the angry statue who sings "The Statue" is supposed to rail at various "sons-of-bitches" who have attributed false virtues to him as a soldier. At Hiers, the words "son-of-a-bitch" are replaced by the phony Fench "feel de putain." I must assume that someone was attempting to substitute "fils de putain" but did not know that "fils" has a silent "L" not a silent "S". The more appropriate original would be "l'enfant de salaud."

Jacques Brel deserves attention, this dinner theatre offering of the show bearing his name does not.Spend your money on one of his records and some good brandy. I'm sure you will be much more satisfied.

Sick comedy dept: "Jabberwocky" takes honors

by Karen Sundstrom

The Last Remake of Beau Geste, and Jabberwocky are presently playing at downtown Columbia theatres (the Miracle and the Jeffferson Square respectively), and they offer an interesting if somewhat twisted change from the usual movie fare. Both films are "black comedies", poking giant holes in some of our most inflated and setimental memories of old movies and storybook tales.

Beau Geste is a barely recognizable reworking of the mid-thirties melodrama that starred Gary Cooper and was directed by William Wellman. The basic outline of the plot remains: the handsome, young scion of a genteel family runs off to join the French Foreign Legion, after snatching the remaining family asset (a large and tacky jewel), in order to prevent his newly acquired and newly widowed step-mother from selling it. He suffers the torments of desert heat, and Legionaire discipline from a fanatic, Prussian sergeant with a fake leg and a monacle, his brother follows him into disgrace and convieniently is witness to his final heroics, before Beau disappears leaving the brother to glory.

The Gary Cooper version is almost a lampoon of itself, with lots of swirling sand, charging Arabs, and infamous villany, but Marty Feldman runs totally amuck and very nearly creates boredom out of slapstick. He adds a few plot twists that are funny, such as casting himself and Michael York as adopted twin brothers, but he throws in a series of disjointed and poorly written set-pieces, (one of which features Avery Schriver as an Arab used-camel salesman). There are enough prat falls and sight gags to fill an entire vaudville show, but the best small parts are not developed. Too many jokes are crowded together and treated as throwaways; if you don't get one just wait thirty seconds, there'll be another.

There is some inspired casting. Peter Ustinov plays the part of the limping sargeant, with an entire assortment of fake legs, and the best 'stunt horse' in the movies. Ann-Margaret vamps through her role as the amorous step-mother with a leer a mile wide and a truly awe-inspiring tri-colored wig. Several other good small parts are played by Terry Thomas, and two actors who appeared in The Three Musketeers, but their parts are not developed they never stay on the screen long enough.

Marty Feldman himself is clever and totally bonzo, and in need of someone to lend him a sense of priorities. He pokes fun at every 'old movie' convention imaginable, from the old Universal pictures logo, to the faithful canine companion. Some of the lampoons come off well, but too many are simply cute. One piece of excellent editing puts Feldman into a section of film taken from the Gary Cooper version of Beau Geste, and another has him conversing with Rudolph Valentino in "silent movie talk." Feldman plays on his visual appearance as the eternally hopeful wimp, and brings to mind another balding lunatic, Woody Allen. But Feldman seems to have borrowed most of his style from Mel Brooks rather than Allen or Gene Wilder, and it's unfortunate. The Last Remake of Beau Geste is not a terrible first effort (Feldman co-wrote, directed and stars), but perhaps he may try to handle only one of those responsibities. For wacko humor that pokes fun at the pretentions of old-movie nuts nothing beats Woody Allen's Play it Again, Sam, and I hope Marty Feldman dissects it frame by frame before his next movie.

Jabberwocky is somewhat along the same general lines, but it's out for blood as well as laughs. Monty Python (the British satirical group that brought us Monty Python's Holy Grail about a year ago) now continues its quest for the real Middle Ages. They don't like: the monarchy, the Church, British trade unions, fat women, rich people, poor people, people in general, and you in particular. Not only is nothing sacred, nothing is tolerated that even suggests pomposity. "Irreverant" is rather too mild a word to describe them, and "obnoxious" ignores the fact that they are deadly accurate (most of the time), and funny when you can bear to laugh.

Using the Lewis Carroll poem Through the Looking Glass as a loose framework, Jabberwocky tells a story with all the ingredients necessary for your basic fairy tale. Once upon a time a bright, handsome, and poverty-stricken Hero goes to the city to seek his fortune so that he can return home and marry his beloved (Griselda), who has given him a token of her affection to carry on his journey.

The King of the city, meanwhile, is holding a tournament to choose a champion to fight the horrible Monster terrorizing the countryside (the Jabberwock). To the brave knight who kills the Monster will go half the kingdom and the Princess' hand in marriage. Naturally the Hero does all the required Heroic things and ends up riding into the sunset with the Princess, but not before Monty Python has a chance to utterly trash everything you ever loved (or hated) about fairy tales.

Nothing escapes. Griselda is a fat slob; she hates the Hero, Dennis, and gives him a rotten potato; jobs are so scarce that men cut off their feet to become beggars; crowds of lunatic religious fanatics beat themselves with scourges and wet spaghetti; the Princess is lovely but brain-damaged; and the local merchants and businessmen want to kep the King from bumping off the Monster because he's been keeping people in town and it's good for business.

The Middle Ages are squalid, filthy, heartless and crude. And very bloody too. What their version reminds you of is a Grimm's fairy tale with the parts about the talking severed head, or the

Shuckin' and jivin' for the textile barons

As the people for each tour group filed out of the meeting room, little things kept catching my attention. Little things like the "Compliments of Cone Mills" denim briefcases they all had. Little things like how a SCTMA or American Textile Institute employee accompanied each group, in addition to the J.P. Stevens tour guide. The orchestration was never subtle but not so blatant as to be obvious to the other participants.

The process of taking raw cotton and turning it into thread, and then into cloth, is a fascinating process to watch. For most of us whose reality is a sheet on the bed, the making of that sheet is an almost hypnotic curiosity. On my first trip through the plant I had not noticed the dust or the looks on the faces of the workers. I had not noticed the dangers of machines which could mangle and kill in an instant. On their first trip though a mill my companions also did not notice.

"I can understand now why sheets cost so much," one woman in my group remarked.

"It's really amazing how you start out with a bale of cotton and end up with a sheet," another said.

She didn't notice the almost subterranean light of the dye room where we were standing. She didn't notice the oppressive heat and men who moved their sweat soaked bodies into the path of cool air blown from fans. She didn't think about the effect of cold drafts on hot bodies.

Curiously enough there had been a change since my first tour through the plant. Today everyone in the plant and anywhere near machinery wore earplugs. A lot of them were of the temporary type worn by the tour participants. My first time through only the workers in the weave room had worn earplugs--there it was a federal requirement.

As we passed through the weave room, my ears shielded from the clattering racket of the looms, my eyes noticed something. It was subtle, almost invisible, but there nevertheless. A fine white pall hung over the room like a shroud--cotton dust. My companions, facinated by the looms, apparently didn't notice.

Further on, in the sewing room, I noticed a woman wearing a white surgical mase over her mouth and nose, obviously filtering something out of the air she breathed even though no dust was apparent.

"It's not the dust you can see that's dangerous," one worker told me during a stolen conversation in the men's room. "It's the tiny pieces that lodge in your lungs; those are the dangerous ones," he said. The ones, he meant, that induce "brown lung."

As the tour neared its end an overhead loud speaker put forth birthday greetings and congratulations for five years of service. Some of the workers on the floor grinned at hearing the announcements.

Further down the line a woman hobbled, monkey fashion, between two machines which let out a high-pitched whistle.

"This is an automatic pillowcase hemmer," our guide told us. The woman had hobbled back and forth between the two machines 12 times in the minute we had been standing there, beads of sweat on her brow. She was paid by the piece; she had to hobble often.

Back in the room where the tour began Paul Barrett, a public relations man for Stevens fielded questions from the audience.

He pointed proudly to the fact that the plant employed a higher percentage of black workers than was found in the surrounding community. All the plant executives stood around the room. No one seemed to notice the fact there were no blacks in that group.

"Our pension is $4 per month for each year of service," Barrett said in response to a question about benefits. Nobody seemed to figure that came to $30 a week after 30 years of service.

In response to a question from a representative of the Carolina Brown Lung Association, the only person in the party beside myself who could remotely be considered hostile, Barrett said the company had a three-year, $20 million dust clean-up campaign under way. Nobody figured that came out to just a little over $75,000 per year for each 85 plants—not even the cost of a new loom.

Barrett dodged questions about the union organizing drive underway against Stevens and was ably assisted by Ponder and Redfern.

"We are not concerned with the union. Too many people are out of work. Cheap labor in foreign countries is forcing Americans out of work, and we should be concerned about imports," Ponder said. Redfern agreed, saying the question was not the union, but whether people had a place to work. The group applauded. I wanted to throw up. None of these two-hour textile industry experts bothered to learn that Stevens owns six overseas textile plants, including one each in Mexico and Japan.

Ponder told the group he didn't feel a union could improve on the spirit of the workers at the plant. After a two hour tour during which no one talked to the workers save a few questions about the operations they were performing, Ponder suddenly knew about the spirit of the workers at the plant. Ponder sat in his plush little office in Columbia for three years, took a two-hour tour and presumed to speak about what the workers at the J.P. Stevens plant felt. The sheer arrogance of the statement made me want to grit my teeth.

I had lived for two years in Oconee County, where more than half the industrial employees were textile workers. I took dozens of pictures of broken men retiring from the mills, the J.P. Stevens plant included, and people receiving their 30 year pins from the mill. I lived in a mill village where 90 percent of the people were mill workers or retired mill workers. The retired ones told me they wished they had never gotten into the mill, and the ones still working voiced the hope that someday they or their children, could get out of the mill. And here was two-hour-tour Ponder telling me how contented the workers were.

I didn't make the rest of the tour, but was it apparent that Ponder, et. al., didn't develop any great insight the following day either. The industry tour concluded at the Miliken Research Center in Spartanburg, where Ponder told the group he wanted to get on with the business of selling capitalism to the young people of America.

"We can't have a Benedict College or a Clemson University without business. Someone has to foot the bill and pay the

CITATION
The State of South Carolina
Richland County
IN THE COURT OF PROBATE
BY A. RAY HINNANT, Probate Judge, Richland County

WHEREAS Dorothy B. Johnson has applied to me for Letters of Administration on the estate of Lillie G. Broomfield, deceased:

THESE ARE, THEREFORE, to cite and admonish all and singular the kindred and creditors of the said deceased to be and appear before me at Columbia, S.C., on the 13th day of September 1977 at 10 o'clock A.M., to show cause, if any, why the said administration should not be granted.

taxes," Ponder told the group.

Redfern also seemed to be taken with the industry after he concluded the tour.

"As a small businessman I was thoroughly impressed at the magnitude of a major corporation and of what it provides in terms of jobs and what it provides in terms of goods and services to the local community. The tour was a mind-opening experience," Redfern said.

Ponder, all during the tour, fielded hostile press questions with glib smart-assness that belied his pose of objectivty.

"It's the American way. If someone is coming to see you, you clean up. If you called me and said you were going to visit Benedict, I'd be sure to have it cleaned up. And at least we know they've got good janitorial service," Ponder replied when asked if he thought the mills had been "cleaned up" for the tour.

An equally glib answer came from Ponder when Osceola asked him how he first got the idea to organize the textile tour.

"How do people get ideas?" Ponder replied.

But Ponder's sudden embrace of the textile industry as a state-wide do gooder isn't all that surprising, if one knows all the facts.

The board of trustees of Benedict College has three members who are textile executives, including W. Gordon McCabe, vice-president of J.P. Stevens. Leading contributors to Benedict's Second Century Fund are Alice Manufacturing, an Easley textile firm, and the Self Foundation. The foundation is a non-profit tax-exempt foundation of Greenwood Mills. The vice-president of Greenwood Mills, James C. Self, Jr., also sits on Benedict's board of trustees.

During an interview following the tour Ponder said he never considered financing the tour himself because "there was never any doubt they (the SCTMA) were going to finance it if it took place." Judging from Ponder's statements to the press, "they apparently got what they paid for."

A few days after the tour Redfern had moderated his position somewhat, saying he felt there were no constant allies or foes for poor people.

"For a lot of the inadequacies that we come up far short on in South Carolina, the textile industry has the money that they should be investing. I noticed they were investing in a lot of other places, but I'm going to ask for, and I plan to get, some money to invest in this community. I want them to live up to their so-called commitment to the state," Redfern said.

But it seems some members of the black community were already incensed at Ponder's and Redfern's public remarks. The Richland County Citizen's Committee is planning to release a statement Saturday regarding the pair's comments.

> "...'As a small businessman I was thoroughly impressed at the magnitude of a major corporation and of what it provides in terms of jobs and what it provides in terms of goods and services to the local community. The tour was a mind-opening experience,' Redfern said..."

Modjeska Simpkins, a member of the committee, and an executive committee member of the Southern Organizing Committee for Economic and Social Justice, said she felt Ponder had gotten in over his head on the textile tour.

"Dr. Ponder should have investigated conditions in the mills before he accepted the invitation," she said. "If he had he would have seen the deplorable conditions and sorry worker treatment which have been documented."

Simpkins said she felt that the system, and the textile industry in particular, had taken advantage of poor blacks and whites throughout the state by moving here to take advantage of cheap wages. The state's 46th ranking in per capita income seems to bear out her contention.

"Having been recognized as an advocate of the people for more than 40 years Ponder's statement not only infuriated me but also showed a limited, if not callous, understanding of conditions as they really are."

"When I was a little girl and lived on a farm, when a cow got sick my father would say it lost its cud. They'd make the cow swallow a dishrag to bring the cud back up. The only joy I got from Dr. Ponder's remarks over the past week is I know he's lost his cud and sooner or later he's going to swallow that dishrag," Simpkins said.

"As for Mr. Redfern, my response is 'he's sold his soul to the company store.' "

Simpkins said she felt Ponder was really in no position to pass judgement on what the textile industry could offer black people in the state since he had not really lived their lives.

"You know it's easy for one with no wrinkles in his belly to go out and see how many spoonfuls of mush a poor man must eat and how little it takes to keep him alive."

So while Ponder sits in his office and sings the praises of the textile industry, Simpkins and her group are organizing a meeting Saturday night at the Town and Tourist Motel on Harden Street. One of the topics: J.P. Stevens' treatment of its workers as told by those workers in the film "Testimony: Justice vs. J.P. Stevens."

While Redfern II, former black activist, sits in his office and counts the merits of the textile industry and his free J.P. Stevens sheets, I'm reminded of what Martin Luther King Sr. said of some of the mill workers who could not even afford to buy the sheets they made.

"Blacks working in textile mills today are really not much better off than their ancestors who toiled as slaves," King said.

I have trouble dealing with blacks who take positions like Redfern and Ponder. It's a difficult for me to perceive them co-habiting with a system that has exploited their race for so long, but I'm reminded of something Mrs. Simpkins told me a few months ago.

Dr. Henry Ponder

"Some white people think blacks are a little better than anyone else; they're liberals. Some whites think blacks are worse than anybody else; they're racists. But what most people fail to realize is we're just like everybody else; we have our lackeys and deadbeats too."

I can't really fault Ponder and Redfern too much, they just want to see blacks get their piece of the action. But I remember a black woman I saw at the Stevens plant. She was stuffing 60 pillowcases a minute into little plastic bags as sweat poured down her forehead. A frown covered her face when we passed by and her shoulders bore the stoop of final resignation.

It's a hell of a way to get a piece.

witch that put in a barrel of nails, visually portrayed in graphic detail against an historically accurate backdrop. There is a large amount of blood and gore, especially during the tournament (but it's a funny scene) and this movie may be too much for people with squeamish stomachs. Nearly everyone gets a chamberpot dumped on their head. I drew the line at the roasted rats-on-a-stick.

Still, it has some violently funny moments and it pokes holes in lots of subjects that deserve hole-poking, as well some that don't. It helps enormously if you are familiar with Monty Python's brand of humor and like it. Otherwise you may want your $3.00 back.

One final word about the Monster. It is, without a doubt the finest and most loathsome movie monster since Mothra, or the one in the porno movie Flesh Gordon. The jabberwock really looks like the illustration in my copy of Alice in Wonderland, "with jaws that bite and claws that snatch", and it is defeated in a great battle with a terrific Black knight.

And the story has a reasonably happy ending, with the Hero and the princess riding into the sunset (setting on the British Empire, unfortunately). I think it's the better of the two movies, but only if you don't mind blatant misanthropy. Go see it on a day when you hate everybody including me.

declaring mandatory single-member districts for the Alabama Legislature, the number of blacks in that body increased from 3 to 15.

Although Johnson acknowledged that court decisions may result in social change, he emphasized that they are not made for that purpose. "When you have a voting-rights case and you find that there's been a pattern and practice of discrimination against the blacks in registering to vote, you don't register the blacks to vote just so that they can gain political power. If they are entitled to relief, you give them relief and you order that they be registered. Now the effect of their being registered and voting and electing a sheriff and other county officials is something the court is not concerned with, and has no interest in...The role federal judges have played in the South has been one of effecting resultantly a social change. And there's no question about it. But that wasn't the motive, and it wasn't the purpose, and it wasn't the intent."

Johnson is the kind of progressive Southerner who has been frozen out of a national role. When Richard Nixon was looking for a Southerner for the Supreme Court, Johnson, a life-long Republican and a hard-liner on criminal cases, was considered. But conservative Republicans in Alabama objected strenuously to Johnson's record in civil-rights cases, and he was dropped.

Johnson's Republican heritage came from growing up in Winston County in the hill country of northwestern Alabama. There, local citizens held a mass meeting after Alabama seceded from the union to join the confederacy and passed a resolution to secede from Alabama.

Johnson is a man who praises Southerners for accepting and adjusting to social change. Gone are the days when he was socially scorned by many in Montgomery and physically threatened by others.

When asked how that hostility made him feel when facing the tough decision, Johnson replied, "You can't let it bother you as far as the decision is concerned. When you get to the point where you can't decide a case like it should be decided, it's time you started doing something else. You have to live with your conscience. You have your professional pride. And those things are important to me."

And they are important also to the FBI.
